

LOCKED IN STORE, HIS LAST NICKEL RINGS PHONE 'SOS'

Bank Superintendent's Son Overlooked in Harlem Booth at Closing Time.

It was nearly midnight when Simon De Pue, Wall street clerk and son of the superintendent of the Harlem Savings Bank, came out of the subway at One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street and Lenox avenue and entered a drug store on a corner. Unnoticed, he walked to the rear and entered a telephone booth, closing the sound proof door. Minutes passed and midnight came and still De Pue continued to hold animated converse in his sound proof hot box. When it became to-day by just a few minutes, the night manager of the drug store called it a day too, and lowered the lights, looking up. De Pue still talked in his telephone booth.

Ten minutes passed and De Pue emerged from the booth to a darkened scene. He rushed to the front door and found it tight against him. So was the back door and all the windows.

And again De Pue held animated converse, his voice vibrating in the bottles of parergic and syrup of aqua ranged on the shelves. Then he considered.

The telephone had been his undoing. Now it must be his rescuer. Luck had not entirely deserted him, for a search of his pockets revealed the needed nickel.

"Spring 400," he begged the lady operator, who obliged. "Is this Police Headquarters?" asked de Pue, and on being informed that his surmise was correct, the agitated young man continued: "I'm Simon De Pue, and I'm locked in a drug store. Come and get me out."

His plea was transferred to the Lenox avenue station, and a policeman was started for the scene of the run.

Meantime De Pue emerged and began pounding on the drug store window to attract attention. He did lots of it, but principally in the form of Policeman O'Keefe, who pressed his ear against the glass trying to understand De Pue, who held animated converse while a crowd, rapidly assuming mob proportions, offered suggestions and advised the imprisoned De Pue to "come on out and be a good fellow," supplementing with "Waddayamean ya lost ya way?"

AND THEN SOME MORE, HOTTER CONVERSATION.

"Call him up on the phone," suggested a Napoleon in the crowd, and De Pue from the fatal booth detailed his slim chances of escape. Then it was remembered that Sadie Marento, who presides over the perfume department, lives at No. 17 West One Hundred and Twenty-fourth street, and a small crowd roused Miss Marento. No, she didn't have a key for the drug store, but Night Manager Logan did, and she supplied his address.

Two hours later Mr. Logan came and released Mr. De Pue, offering him profuse apologies for his oversight.

And De Pue for the last time again held animated converse.

CATCH SACCO AT LAST.

Police Have Been Looking for Him Since July 25.

Thomas Sacco, nineteen years old, of No. 825 Courtland avenue, Bronx, was arraigned before Magistrate Harris in the Morrisania Court this morning on a charge of assaulting Daniel Duran, a mason and contractor, living at No. 825 Courtland avenue. He was held in $500 bail for trial.

Sacco is said to be a member of a gang who have given the police much trouble. The assault occurred on July 25 in front of Duran's place when, it is alleged, Sacco struck him across the head and on the hand, breaking a finger with a wooden fence picket. Detective John Schuening of the Morrisania station, arrested Sacco last night after he had successfully eluded the officers since July.

Woman Hurt in Fall From Window

The sound of voices in a courtyard waked Mrs. Della Dragon, thirty-five years old, of No. 544 West Forty-fourth street early to-day. She was spending the night with Mrs. Thomas Conroy of No. 520 East One Hundred and Forty-ninth street, the Bronx. She got up and looked out of the window, losing her balance and falling into the court, one story below. Dr. Simmons took her to the Lincoln Hospital, where it was said she had internal injuries and a fractured leg.
